HEADLINE: Club hopes county line can move;
Plan would put facility in DeKalb, not Gwinnett

BYLINE: BRIAN FEAGANS

SOURCE: AJC

BODY:

Taking a dip at the Oaks Country Club won't mean crossing into Gwinnett County if Doraville officials have their way.

The DeKalb County city wants the county line shifted a hair northeast so the Oaks is in Doraville rather than unincorporated Gwinnett.

As it is, the pool, tennis courts and clubhouse sit in a sort of no man's land where Laurel Oak Court dead-ends. Although the facilities are in Gwinnett, accessing them means driving nearly a mile on neighborhood roads in Doraville.

Club President David Weese, who is a Doraville city councilman, said that has caused confusion and delays in police enforcement in the past.

The 40-year-old club has had problems with vandals who throw lawn chairs, tables and umbrellas into the pool, Weese said. Parties at the club, which is rented out, also have drawn noise complaints. But Weese said Gwinnett police take longer to reach the area than Doraville officers.

"If they do come, it takes them 30 or 40 minutes to go over here," Weese said while taking a break from cleaning the pool.

Cpl. Ray Dunlap, a spokesman for the Gwinnett Police Department, said the club is treated no differently than other parts of Gwinnett.

Doraville police may be first on the scene on some occasions, but that's only because they happened to have an officer in the area or a lighter load of calls at the time, Dunlap said.

"There would be no reason for Gwinnett County to have any kind of delayed response in getting there," he said. "That's not even an issue."

Doraville's initial attempt to annex the 3.5 acres and keep it within Gwinnett County failed earlier this month after hitting resistance from Gwinnett officials. Commissioners didn't want another city in the county, which already leads the state with 14 towns.

So Doraville has changed strategies. It will officially withdraw the annexation request Tuesday and ask the DeKalb County Board of Commissioners to vote on shifting the county line to include the Oaks.

That way, the club will be in Doraville and DeKalb, avoiding a controversial cross-county annexation that Gwinnett officials say would make it easier for Doraville to expand farther into Gwinnett.

The Gwinnett County Board of Commissioners and grand juries in both counties also would have to sign off on the plan.

Doraville City Attorney Rick Powell said he hadn't talked to any Gwinnett commissioners yet. He plans to meet with DeKalb attorneys in coming weeks.

Powell said he doesn't expect the same kind of resistance as Doraville's original annexation petition drew. The request was piggybacked on a failed petition to annex 69 acres of Gwinnett for a mixed-use project called the Global Forum.

By itself, the Oaks is "so small. And it doesn't have a significant economic impact," Powell said.

But Gwinnett County Commissioner Bert Nasuti, whose district includes the Oaks, said he'd have to see hard evidence that safety would be improved before supporting a shift in the county line. Nasuti said he'd have to be sure the greater housing densities allowed in DeKalb and Doraville weren't a possible underlying motive for the proposed move.

"I wouldn't support it if it were for development," Nasuti said.

Weese said the club's roughly 40 members aren't interested in selling the property. They want to keep it an active swim club, he said.

The Oaks' efforts come as the Norris Lake community near Stone Mountain tries to move the county line in the other direction. A small piece of the 905-home neighborhood is in DeKalb, and residents there want the county to relinquish the turf to Gwinnett. They recently finished a survey of the land --- the first step toward getting the county line moved. Police and fire coverage is the driving force there, as well.

In Doraville, Mayor Gene Lively said the Oaks' annexation would make things easier for city officers who sometimes get noise complaints from Doraville residents living near the Gwinnett clubhouse. It also would eliminate wasteful overlap, he said.

"Our police probably go by there 20 to 25 times per day," Lively said. "But if there's a call, we can't enforce it in Gwinnett County."

Dunlap said the club actually is better protected than most places.

"Right now, they're probably getting the best of both worlds," he said. "Why give up having two police departments close by?"

Doraville. The Doraville station is elevated with a single island platform between two tracks. This is the last stop on the northeast Doraville line. It opened in December, 1992. The station has a gabled green metal roof over the middle portion of the platform and it goes down to cover the rail to bus area, also. All the columns and walls are made of cement. Facing the southbound side, you can see freight line tracks that run parallel to the line, and just beyond that is the GM Doraville Assembly Plant. Facing the northbound side, you can see the roof of the bus to rail transfer area. Looking also on the northbound side, toward the south end of the station, you can see the parking deck for commuters and long term parking. The two parking decks can hold 1,100 cars.

HEADLINE: GM plant to receive upgrade;
No cuts in staff expected

BYLINE: TONY WILBERT

BODY:

General Motors said Monday it will spend $150 million to pave the way for production of a new generation of minivans at its Doraville assembly plant, as it phases out models currently being made there.

The capital expenditure will not immediately create new jobs at the plant, but it is expected to retain the 3,600 or so already there.

"It's vital for Georgia's economy in light of the other announcements that have not been so good," Gov. Sonny Perdue said of keeping the GM jobs at the plant near Spaghetti Junction in DeKalb County.

Georgia expects to lose 9,000 jobs in 2003 as several companies, including Coca-Cola, Kmart, Federated Department Stores and J.C. Penney, announced major layoffs.

GM is the second large automaker to announce new manufacturing plans for Georgia in the past three weeks. On Jan. 13, DaimlerChrysler AG finally announced, after months of unconfirmed reports, that it would build a $754 million Sprinter van plant in Pooler, near Savannah.

Plans call for the Doraville assembly plant to begin production on its new line of what the company calls "midvans" in late 2004. Plant Manager David Prange said GM "doesn't expect the manpower [at Doraville] to be much different, up or down," when the changeover occurs.

Total payroll for the plant's 3,600 employees, 3,300 of whom are paid hourly wages, topped $220 million in 2002, according to General Motors.

The Doraville jobs could have been jeopardized without the new commitment, said Claude Willis III, shop chairman at Local 10 of the United Auto Workers union. The group's Strategy Board had projected what would have happened to the jobs without the commitment, he said.

"We would have faced a tough future," Willis said.

GM will use the $150 million to renovate and retool the Doraville plant's body shop and general assembly areas to ready them to produce new minivans from Chevrolet, Pontiac, and for the first time, Buick and Saturn.

Doraville will be the only plant to produce the midvans, Prange said.

The plant currently manufactures the Chevrolet Venture, Pontiac Montana and Oldsmobile Silhouette lines. Its workers built 238,609 vehicles in 2002.

Prange would not give a projection of how many would be built after the plant is converted for the new lines. The names for the vans that will be produced in late 2004 have not yet been selected, said Amy Schwinge, a company spokeswoman.

GM converted the Doraville plant to make minivans in 1995 and 1996. Previously, it manufactured Oldsmobile Cutlass Supremes.

By August 2000, the Doraville plant had produced 1 million minivans.

Minivan sales, though, have slowed recently.

The National Automobile Dealers Association projects that sales of cars and light trucks will fall 1.8 percent to 16.5 million this year and possibly more if there is a war with Iraq.

Sales figures aside, the county faced national competition for the new production lines, DeKalb Chief Executive Vernon Jones said.

The county offered GM economic incentives, but Jones would not elaborate. "We provided enough incentives to help us make this deal," he said.

The DeKalb County Development Authority can issue taxable bonds to help a company such as GM finance a plant expansion if it attracts or retains jobs in the county.

When the upgrade is completed, GM will pay about $5.5 million in annual property taxes, GM spokesman Dan Flores said. That's $1 million more than it currently pays at the 166-acre Doraville property, which contains 3.6 million square feet of space.

Prange and other GM executives would say little about what the new midvan lines will look like because of competitive concerns. More information, including visuals, will be released closer to the rollout, Prange said.

The new vans are expected to resemble a cross between sport-utility vehicles and minivans.

"I'm not sure exactly what it is, but it's really pretty," the UAW's Willis said.
